

The FAR tells you WHY a student struggles to read so that you can determine HOW to intervene

The FAR examines the underlying cognitive and linguistic processes that support proficient reading skills. It takes a neurodevelopmental approach to reading and is based on the premise that reading disorders vary by dyslexic subtype.

The FAR is comprehensive

- Includes 15 subtests that measure various aspects of phonological development, orthographical processing, decoding skills, morphological awareness, reading fluency, and comprehension skills.
- Can be used for general screening of dyslexia, progress monitoring of discrete skills for schools operating in an RTI paradigm, and design of a deficit- or skill-specific intervention.
- Screening Form includes three subtests that yield a single composite score that helps determine whether further assessment is warranted.

The FAR is psychometrically sound

- Standardized on a sample of 1,074 examinees in prekindergarten to college drawn from 30 states using a population-proportionate, stratified random sampling plan based on 2012 U.S. Census statistics.
- Subtests have median reliability coefficients that range from .67 to .95, the majority of which are in the upper .80s and .90s, indicating an overall high degree of internal consistency.
- Demonstrates consistent relationships in the expected direction and magnitude with a variety of external variables including grade; other reading tests; and measures of achievement, memory, and intelligence.
- Includes clinical samples of more than 120 students with learning problems, ADHD, and intellectual developmental disorder.
